Letter of Recommendation: How to Ask for It

Writing a college letter of recommendation requires considerable effort. Don't just blurt out a request to a supervisor or instructor you see walking down the hallway. Choose your letter of recommendation writers carefully, and plan out your timing and approach. Most importantly, don't procrastinate.

Letter of recommendation: Ask someone who knows you well

When deciding on whom to ask, don’t simply think of those classes in which you have done well: think of instructors or supervisors who are most familiar with your work and achievements. Readers look for evidence of the letter writer’s familiarity with your work. Without it, letters of recommendation lack credibility. While you might be tempted to request a college letter of recommendation from a tenured academic superstar, refrain from doing so unless you know the recommendation will be strong. An impressive signature will not compensate for a lukewarm letter.

Letter of recommendation: Ask early

Don’t wait until the last minute. Instructors are flooded with college letter of recommendation requests at the end of the semester (as well as near application deadlines), and you don't want your letter to suffer as a result. If you approach your instructor a few months before the deadline, you will avoid putting him or her under pressure, and you give him or her plenty of time to ponder your performance. As the deadline approaches, you can always send the writer a friendly reminder of the impending deadline.

Letter of recommendation: Ask personally

When seeking letters of recommendation, don't send e-mails or leave voicemails. It's to your advantage to ask the person face-to-face. This conveys just how important this letter is to you. Many instructors and supervisors deal with dozens of recommendation requests every year. Even if you are a stellar student or employee, they might not remember that smashing astute comment you made back in March. Along with the letter of recommendation form and materials, include a vivid reminder of your past accomplishments, particularly those with which your instructor or supervisor is already familiar. You might include a resume and/or a relevant writing sample (preferably one written for that particular instructor, and one which earned you a high grade).

If you intend to study agronomy and your instructor is under the impression you are planning on pursuing astronomy, your admission readers might end up with either a hysterical or quizzical letter of recommendation. Write down your plans and goals so that your writer is aware of them.

Letter of recommendation: Provide all necessary materials

Most applications include specific forms for letter of recommendation writers. They often ask for both a written-out statement and a series of short questions. If you are asking your instructor for several versions of the letter — for instance, if you are applying to a number of schools — you might remind him or her that the statement need not be written directly on the sheet itself; it can simply be stapled to the form. Always provide your writer with stamped envelopes. If you are asking for multiple letters, it’s a good idea to organize all the forms in one folder and include a cover sheet with a list of the schools for which you are requesting letters. Remember to include envelopes of the appropriate size, and overestimate the amount of postage (the instructor might attach extra pages to the form). Some applications require the instructor to return the letter to you in a sealed envelope. Ask the writer to sign the flap of the envelope. Finally, you might consider providing the letter writer with a USB flash drive for saving a copy of the letter. Letters, after all, have been lost in the mail (both the physical and digital versions) before — not to mention in admission offices — and there’s always a chance you might have to ask for a second copy to be sent out.

Letter of recommendation: Waive your right to read the letter

Federal law grants you access to your letters of recommendation, but many applications include a form where you can waive your rights to read the letter. We highly recommend that you do so. This reassures the reader that the instructor has written a candid letter. Studies have shown that confidential letters carry far more weight. In addition, writers are far more comfortable writing a complete, candid letter when they know the applicant will not have access to the text. If you fear that the letter writer might not do justice to your achievements or might include negative information — well, that’s a good sign you should not be asking that person for a letter of recommendation.

Letter of recommendation: Send a thank-you note

Always send your writer a thank-you note after you know the letter has been sent out, whether or not you have heard from the school. Don't wait too long to do this: a week or two is a good timeline.

Letters of recommendation are important parts of the admissions process, and should be treated as such. For some students, these letters will be a crucial element in acceptance, and for other students they can be perfect supplements for a college interview (sometimes called an admission interview).

Peterson's Staff
List of References/Reference Page

What is a List of References or a Reference Page?
Employers and graduate schools ask for a list of professional references who they can call upon to check on the information you provided in your resume and cover letter, ask about character, and get a better sense of the person they are considering for a position. Even if they do not ask for a list of references, it is always a good idea to include one with your materials.

It is very important to keep this up-to-date and continually check with your references to ensure it is okay you are providing their contact. If you are searching for a job or expect them to be called, make sure to give them advance notice so they can prepare! One of the worst things you can do is catch them off guard where they may not give you a good reference. You should format this document to match your cover letter and resume.

Who to Include?
Think of professors and employers who know your work ethic and personality. Always check with them to ensure you can use them as a reference. Do not list friends or family.

What to Include
For each reference, you should include the person's name, job title, the name of the company where they work, their business phone number, their home phone number (only if that is acceptable to the person), and their email address.

It can also be helpful to include a brief description of the nature of your relationship with the reference (i.e. you could note someone was Supervisor at ABC Company, or Office Manager at XYZ Company), but it is not necessary to include this information.

How Many References?
Most employers want to call three people. Therefore, you should provide four names on your reference page. That way, if the employer has difficulty contacting anyone, there will be an extra person on the list to contact.

Although most employers want to contact three people, you should always be ready with six references any at any point when you are job searching.